She utilizes case material in clinical studies to answer practical relevant questions in veterinary cardiology with an emphasis on work that can be translated to primary care veterinary medicine. She has published manuscripts, book chapters and a textbook. Her interests and expertise in teaching have led to many invitations to organize and participate in continuing education events for veterinarians and veterinary cardiologists globally. These opportunities, coupled with her involvement in multicenter international studies, have provided her with a global perspective of veterinary cardiology.

She is a member of the Cardiac Education Group (CEG), a not-for-profit organization of board-certified veterinary cardiologists from both academia and private practice that offers independent recommendations for the evaluation and treatment of canine heart disease. The group is committed to providing resources and information on the diagnosis, treatment and management of heart disease and heart failure in dogs and cats in order to promote early detection and diagnosis with greater accuracy and confidence.
